It is known to use various mechanisms to harvest the water from a heavy downpour of rain to provide a flow of water to plants. Devices such as submergible wheels have been invented to harvest such downpours. In addition to applying water directly to plants by such systems, it is also known to apply a flow of water to an underlayment, which in turn is applied to the earth to act as a mulching surface. Other examples of the use of simple submergible wheels include U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,560,038 and 4,704,715 to Beck et al. Submergible wheels have been used to harvest rainfall and deliver it to the earth's surface. In general the wheels are comprised of a plurality of fluid conducting conduits disposed in a spaced, parallel arrangement, and each conduit carries a flow of liquid from a lower elevation to an upper elevation. A wheel is disposed on the upper elevation of each conduit to increase the surface area of fluid communication and thus increase the yield of liquid per unit area of wheel. In one embodiment, however, each wheel is contained in a single cap having a top and a bottom. The wheels are arranged in a vertical configuration and the bottom edge of each wheel is in continuous contact with the wheel below it. It is known to use a device having at least one pivotable collection tray for receiving water and directing it to an outlet for distribution to plants. In such a system, a channel is formed in the tray that is filled with water. As the water flows from the channel into the outlet it is distributed to plants. The outlet may be positioned above or below the tray. In one embodiment, a plurality of trays is used. In a second embodiment, a single tray is used in conjunction with a weir as an outlet. A weir is positioned above a tray to capture and direct water flowing above the tray. In a variety of systems, water that is collected by the submergible wheels f678ea99e
